FUN WITH FIGURES

Commentators protesting against President Roosevelt's latest synthetic defense of billionists are screaming into a feather pillow. Their contention that it is serious when the chief executive of the United States makes a mistake in arithmetic apparently isn't going to be answered.

Last Monday at Hyde Park, Mr. Roosevelt called a special press conference in which he managed, perhaps by accident, to give his listeners the impression that he thought government debt today is no larger than it was in 1932. When an incredulous correspondent asked the President to repeat what he had said the original impression was confirmed.

Mr. Roosevelt insisted that the increase in federal debt under the New Deal has been offset by a decrease in state, county and local government debt. Treasury figures, of course, can be produced by the bushel to prove that this is not true. While state, county and local government debt have not increased to an important extent, they have not decreased.

Additions to federal debt represent a net increase in government debt. They have not been offset by reductions of other types of government debt. They have not even been discounted to any important extent by reductions of private debt. Mr. Roosevelt's argument for piling up federal debt was without foundation, in other words, because his major premise was 100 percent wrong.

However, no explanation has been given. If embarrassed by his arithmetic faux pas, Mr. Roosevelt has given no sign. He seems content to let his countrymen believe that his most vital policy—deficit spending—rests on an assumption that has no relation whatever to fact.

GRAVY FOR MASHED POTATOES

As gravity as gravy for mashed potatoes seems to be the proper comment on a plan whereby 11 western railroads will articulate their service with automobiles beginning next May. Passengers will have at their disposal a fleet of 2,000 automobiles which they can use in much the same way as they use train service.

Thus, a businessman planning a trip to a point 50 miles from a city 500 miles from his home can reach the city by train, rent a car for the 100 mile round trip, and return by train. All arrangements can be made in advance and the journey completed, claim the railroads, at a much lower cost and certainly in less time than it can be completed by automobile.

One of the things in the favor of railroads trying to work out a better relationship between their service and the convenience of auto transportation is the public's genuine interest in their problem. The train-auto plan is certain to command attention; its practicality and convenience are obvious. It's one of those things that should have been done years ago.

GEN. OBSOLESCENCE

Gen. Winter, chestiest general of them all up to this time, has a rival—Gen. Obsolescence. It is reported from London that Germany is constructing a new type of bombing plane.

Behind the report is this probable explanation. The bombers on which the Germans were depending to give them superiority in the air have proved no match for Britain's fastest pursuit planes. Therefore, it is necessary to find a faster bomber. Success, of course, will make all the old bombers obsolete, though they've never been used. When the better bomber has been produced in numbers sufficient to wipe England off the map, furthermore, all the English have to do is find a better pursuit plane to make the better bombers obsolete and so on ad infinitum.

It is a costly and nerve-wracking kind of warfare without a silver lining or a definitive conclusion in sight. Gen. Obsolescence is going to be a hard man to beat; he is second only to Gen. Winter as the master strategist of them all.

SPOOF OF THE DAY

No one seems to know much about William Dudley Pelley, except that he's the head men of an outfit called the Silver Shirt Legion—and no one knows much about that either.

But Mr. Pelley has won transitory prominence by a curious statement. If the Dies committee keeps on probing, he says, his own crowd will send their shirts to the laundry and disperse. The committee, it seems, is doing exactly what the shirters want to do. Quite a spoof, this Mr. Pelley. When did a shirt organizer ever disband his gang voluntarily?

In view of the curious fact that no one knows what the Dies committee is trying to do either (it is just opposed to un-Americanism) the whole business is left in mid-air. The committee does have one big advantage over Pelley's crowd; its members wear just common, ordinary shirts. Perhaps that makes a difference.

THE STARS SAY:

For Sunday, February 11

SUNDAY'S horoscope holds excellent auguries for progress and prosperity, both in spiritual and material affairs. In the former there should be outstanding achievements, while in the latter industry, enterprise and proper precaution against entanglements and deception should attract promotion and other forms of preferment from superiors. Social and romantic affairs also thrive and give much pleasure.

Those whose birthday it is may look for a year of decided progress and prosperity, with rewards for industry, initiative and careful attention to obligations. Be alert to sinister attack or entanglements. In social, sentimental and cultural associations there should also be gratification.

A child born on this day may be versatile, literary, artistic, energetic and industrious, and at the same time gentle, amiable and so soft-hearted it may be duped by craft and duplicity.

For Monday, February 12

MONDAY'S astrological forecast continues the benignant auguries of Sunday, where diligence, enterprise and fine constructive ability and determined efforts win the preferment and support of those in power and prestige. This promise may meet surprising fulfillments in the form of gifts, bequests or other substantial tokens of esteem and good will. High goals are indicated.

Those whose birthday it is are on the eve of a year in which they may reap rich rewards for past performances, where hard work, energy and enterprise are recognized by superiors and those in authority. There may be gifts, legacies or other substantial rewards of merit and endeavor. Social and emotional aspects of progress and pleasure also loom large. Seek high goals.

A child born on this day may be efficient, ambitious and dependable, with much integrity and nobility of heart and purpose. It may find happy rewards in its material and personal objectives.

Deprived of Food?

Applying this idea to cancer cells and the freezing treatment, the question is whether cancer cells are deprived by cold of food substances which they need. We know that in the hibernating animal, all the sugar in the body accumulates in the liver. Apparently that is why they go to sleep. The brain is deprived of its necessary sugar. All functional processes decline. A ground-hog, or woodchuck, during hibernation will have a body temperature as low as 40 degrees F. It is theoretically possible for human beings to be reduced to this level. If so, the sugar in the body may be checked off from body cells and cancer cells, deprived of this nutritive material, disintegrate.

When the ground-hog wakes up naturally from his winter sleep, he has the "shakes" like a person with palsy for several hours; this also indicates lack of sugar in the tissues.

At any rate, the humble ground-hog is being used for experimental purposes to see if it can throw light on the mechanism of the new freezing treatment.

Dr. Clendening will answer questions of general interest only, and then only through his column.

packs to 80 or 70 degrees F., and in many instances severe cases of cancer are relieved and apparently improved.

Of course, doctors are wondering just what the mechanism is that causes this improvement.

A possible analogy is found in the treatment of melancholy and depressed states (dementia praecox) by the use of insulin. Insulin, of course, reduces the sugar in the blood and it is theoretically supposed that the insulin deprives the brain of sugar. We know that the brain cells utilize only sugar and oxygen in their nutritional processes. They do not use protein. It has been supposed that when the brain cells are deprived of these two elements, the brain starts in some way on a new functional track, which is the cause of the improvement.

This is a matter that a person decides within his own heart. However there are perils to one's own life and security in rejecting the Lord of life. Christ has promised to bring us the abundant life if we follow Him. Eternal life is determined upon our acceptance of Him as Lord and Savior."

Morning worship, 11:00. Sermon. "The Lenten season does not consist in subtractions; it rather deals in and with the additions of life. The message of the Cross, which is particularly emphasized at this time, has a special appeal to us for a more consecrated life, for a more faithful discipleship to Christ, for a prayerful walking with God, and especially for a renewed and intensive interest in doing the Lord's work, the ingathering of the souls of men and women.

"Sweet the moments, rich in blessing. Which before the Cross we spend; Life and health and peace possessing. From the sinner's dying Friend."

Lenten Meditation

There is no more beautiful and evangelical chapter in the Old Testament than chapter 53 in the book of Isaiah. It is a perfect picture of the suffering Messiah, drawn centuries in advance by the inspired prophet.

The verses two and three are a brief biography of the Servant of the Lord. The soil out of which He grew was "dry ground," Israel had degenerated. The house of David had fallen on evil days. In obscurity and lowliness this unique Person, the Son of God and the Son of David, had His beginnings. Amid the same surroundings He grew up.

Then He began His public ministry. He taught, He healed, He blessed. But only a few adhered to Him. Only a few saw in Him "the glory as of the Only-Begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth." The mass of His contemporaries saw in Him nothing desirable. Claiming to be the promised Messiah He met none of their expectations. His kingdom was not of this world. He insisted on no revolt against Rome. He offered no material advantages. And so He was "despised and rejected of men."

Eventually contempt developed into bitter hatred. His teachings threatened the cherished prerogatives of mighty men in church and state. Therefore they accomplished His death. He became "a man of sorrow and acquainted with grief." The story of His last earthly hours is one of awful humiliation and excruciating torment.

Would this history repeat itself today? There is no doubt about it. The world has not changed. The great mass of men still scorn the gospel of love and redemption that He proclaimed. They understand and evaluate earthly values. They have no esteem for the beauties of the spirit.

BROTHERLY AID TO ERRING BOYS

Volunteer Assistants Aid Probation Department Work

PITTSBURGH—Seven hundred volunteer assistants or "big brothers" are helping Allegheny county's parole and probation department to aid young law-breakers make good on the "second chance" extended by the court.

Among the new assistants are civic leaders of the district, clergymen and industrialists, 43 of whom have been working since September, when the plan was inaugurated by county criminal court judges headed by Judge William H. McNaughton.

Thus far, only two of the 43 youths on probation handed over to volunteer officers have failed to "go straight."

The plan was an outgrowth of an understaffed parole staff, a condition which previously had made it impossible to supervise paroled or probationed defendants.

Each "officer" is assigned a probationary youth who lives in his own community. The duty of the volunteer is to act as a "big brother" to his charge.

Once a week, the "big brothers" meet with the youths in their care and report on their conduct monthly to the parole office.

Directing and coordinating the work of these volunteer officers is Howard R. Haines, probation officer, who has been assigned specially to the task by J. C. Coulter, head of the county probation department.

"Even if we had enough probation and parole officers this system would still be valuable," its founder, Judge McNaughton, explains. "A neighbor can't get into the heat of a boy the officer can't. He can become a boy's friend."

Richard Greene, Alice Faye and Fred MacMurray in "Little Old New York" at the State Sunday through Tuesday

The lusty, brawling settlement of New York, in the days when Robert Fulton was trying to perfect his steamship invention, is the background of "Little Old New York" at the State Sunday, Monday and Tuesday.

Alice Faye, Fred MacMurray and Richard Greene head the excellent cast, which includes Brenda Joyce, Albert Albert and Robert Barrat.

While it bears not the faintest resemblance to the earlier version of "Little Old New York," the latest film is still good entertainment, the story of a waterfront belle who fell in love with the young inventor and helped him win success.

The State theater attractions the rest of the week are:

Wednesday and Thursday—"Brother Rat and the Baby," featuring Priscilla Lane, Jane Bryan, Jane Wyman, Wayne Morris, Eddie Albert and Boyd Ragan.

Friday and Saturday—"The Shop Around the Corner," with Margaret Sullivan and James Stewart, Frank Morgan and Joseph Schildkraut.

Concluding tonight—"The Housekeeper's Daughter," with Joan Bennett, Adolphe Menjou and John Hubbard.

At The Grand

The Grand's Sunday double bill includes: "British Intelligence," with Boris Karloff and Margaret Lindsay in a story of spies of Britain and Germany during the last World War; and "The Man Who Wouldn't Talk," featuring Lloyd Nolan, Jean Rogers, Richard Clarke.

Onslow Stevens and Eric Blore, in a story of a murderer who admits his crime but nothing else.

The Grand's other features this week are:

Wednesday only—"Music in My Heart," with Rita Hayworth, Tony Martin and Edith Fellows; and "My Son Is Guilty," with Bruce Cabot and Harry Carey, Jacqueline Wells and Wynne Gibson.

Friday and Saturday—"Allegheny Uprising," with John Wayne and Claire Trevor of "Stagecoach" and Wilfred Lawson (Pygmalion), George Sanders, Brian Donlevy, Mironi Olsen and Robert Barrat.

Concluding tonight—"Marshal of Sante Fe" with William Boyd as Hopalong Cassidy.

"RED EARTH" by TOM GILL

CHAPTER XVII

"Am I wrong in being proud of Coronado?" Bodine asked.

Moving forward, Douglas appraised the archer and the clean-cut flanks, and the eyes that still held a lurking fire.

"Dios," he marveled, "but I should love to ride him."

Bodine laughed outright, and something all too obvious in that laugh brought a flush to Douglas' face.

"No doubt you would," the artist answered, "but it happens there are not two men in all the border who can ride him. This Coronado of mine is a devil, it took me weeks before I was able to get a cinch under his belly."

Douglas examined the stallion again, leaning down to peer between the bars of the stall. Rising, he shook his head.

"Yes, a superb animal, but galled behind the left shoulder. Too tight a cinch." He sighed. "Here in America spirited horses are wasted. Now in Spain—"

"In Spain," Bodine was swiftly losing his good nature, "in Spain I daresay you would ride him bare-back."

Douglas wagged an admonitory finger. You may be a great painter, my friend, but in matters of horsemanship you must come to us rancheros. Yes, I should certainly love to ride him."

Nothing could be better calculated to touch Bodine on the raw than a reflection upon his knowledge of horses.

And indeed the suavity had faded from the artist's voice. "Almost you tempt me, Jack Douglas."

"To let you mount this man-killer of mine and get your aristocratic ears filled with coral dust."

Before Douglas could answer, Lola had grasped him by the arm. "Do not do this thing, foolish one—it is madness." Angriely she flared up a Bodine. "You should not tempt him, Paul. I have not forgotten how your vaquero was trampled by this killer of yours. I will not let my cousin even try."

"You alarm yourself unnecessarily, Lola. There is no real danger of injury to your cousin." In growing anger at Douglas' words, Bodine felt an irresistible desire to humble this respectable faddist who talked with such assurance yet rode only the quietest and gentlest of horses. But Douglas was quietly polishing his glasses.

"My cousin does not approve. Let us talk no more about it." He saw Alison's pitying smile, saw Lola bite her lips in mortification, and heard again that ring of patronizing laughter from Bodine, then as if in afterthought he asked, "Do you ride him yourself?"

"He is kept for breeding. No one has ridden Coronado in the past year."

Douglas' eyebrows raised. "But conceive of owning a horse you were afraid to ride."

Deeper than any lash those accents of derisive wonder bit into Bodine. Uncontrollably his face thrust forward and he tapped Douglas on the chest.

"Jack Douglas, I will do something I have never done before." The artist's voice was thick with anger. "I offer you this—ride Coronado, and he belongs to you."

There was an instant silence, as if already Bodine regretted the rashness of his gesture, while all eyes turned toward Douglas.

Very slowly he put on his glasses, and in leisurely deliberation once more examined those clean-molded legs and deep, full chest.

"You offer me Coronado? Bueno, I accept. But I must not be outdone in generosity, amago. If I fail to ride this stallion of yours, you shall choose any five of the best of my own horses."

Fearfully Lola protested. "Jack—"

His upraised hand silenced her. "It is so difficult to please this little cousin of mine. Only yesterday she lectured me because I do not ride enough. Lead your stallion into the corral!"

Hastily, as if impatient for the sunlight, the huge horse stepped out from his stall, walking with a fastidious lightness that brought a thrill of pleasure to Douglas' heart, while in uneasy silence the rest of the group followed to the corral, where Douglas and the stable boy alone entered the circular enclosure.

Through the bars of the corral Douglas handed Alison his camera. "If you would hold this for me, please?"

She took it, her puzzled eyes on his, and without another word the man turned to face his huge antagonist.

Reared erect, nostrils distended, the stallion seemed to be waiting. Beneath its shining coat Douglas could see the play of powerful muscles, and he knew that master horseman as he was the task before him would be no easy one. Unhurriedly he stepped forward, and while the peon held the animal's head, he climbed clumsily into the saddle, then looked uncertainly about him until Bodine smiled in open relief—no one who sat a horse as he did could hope to ride Coronado.

"That solemn owl will not keep his glasses long," the little man murmured to Alison, then called to the peon. "Let go his head!"

Instantly the servant darted back and clambered to the topmost bar of the corral—the arena was free at last to those two wary adversaries. Both were absolutely immobile now, poised as if taking each other's measure.

Then without warning, without a sound, the battle was on.

Bolt upright on hind legs the animal reared until it stood towering above the corral, pawing the air with its forefeet, while the peon and Douglas' feet clamped downward in the stirrups. Superbly confident, the great brute balanced there, then whirled, sending the rider's hat spinning to the dust, and gathering himself, he leaped three times, landing with stiff forelegs, jarring the very earth with the impact, jerking Douglas' head forward beneath those smashing blows.

Both girls had turned their faces away, and from his perch the Mexican servant muttered beneath his breath, "Dios, no one can stand that long." But Bodine's eyes never wavered. With cold glittering enjoyment they followed every move and now his pupils dilated a little, for the end seemed not far off.

Douglas was being twisted over the cantle and up on the horn, shaken and jarred, his body thrown mercilessly from side to side as the maddened animal leaped, bucked and unfurled about the corral.

To Record it seemed beyond all possibility that Douglas should keep his seat, yet somehow his body never left the saddle, but swayed as the horse plunged beneath him while about them the dust of the corral rose like a yellow cloud. No quarter now, no truce. The animal's eyes were flaming red with anger, the shoulders flecked with foam.

A killing pace—neither beast nor rider could stand it long. Outside every eye was following this horseman who seemed always on the brink of disaster, as if only successive miracles were keeping him from being thrown. Record wiped the perspiration from his lips. "By Gad, that's riding!" he whispered.

It was more than magnificent riding—it was magnificent showmanship as well. It was deadly serious acting, an art so thoroughly mastered that it concealed itself, and even Record found it hard to believe that this swaying, shaken, all but defeated rider was producing an illusion that surpassed any mere horsemanship the border had ever seen. It was mystification in its highest form—the very essence of equine mastery. He seemed so near disaster, yet that disaster never came.

Suddenly Record's heart jumped and Alison screamed. Without warning the great stallion had reared upright and flung himself backward in a last attempt to conquer his enemy by crushing him beneath the saddle horn. Lola hid her face in her hands as the maddened beast fell straight on its back, hurling a cloud of tawny dust high in the air, obliterating the two contestants from the sight of the anxious spectators outside. Record was half over the wall of the corral when horse and rider crashed to earth, and through the sand-filled air he saw Douglas leap aside landing on his feet. Again the swirling dust of the corral hid them, but when the air cleared the stallion was standing upright, quietly in the saddle, brushing the sand from his shoulders, Douglas sat.

The battle was over. Trembling head lowered, still the fire-gone from his eyes, the great beast seemed the very picture of defeat, but not yet trusting that sudden surrender, Douglas raised the reins, touching the quivering flanks gently with his spur, and in response the horse moved a few feet forward, then stopped, as if awaiting the will of its master. Three times about the corral Douglas rode, causing the horse to wheel, stop and start again, then slipping from the saddle, he led his new prize forth.

With eyes still unbelieving, the watching peon slid to earth, and fast as bare feet could carry him he raced to the stable to tell the tale of how this Gringo had ridden Coronado. Record, meanwhile, was pounding Douglas' back in high delight, and still breathless with the struggle Douglas looked about him.

"But where is Bodine?"

The ranger grinned. "Just went inside. Somehow he wasn't looking happy."

"Not happy? But what a pity! I must leave my little mare with him as consolation."

From a distance Douglas saw Alison's eyes fixed on him in long, thoughtful scrutiny, and quickly he turned to stroke Coronado's neck.

But as they rode back late that afternoon, Record took the first opportunity to voice his misgivings. "It wasn't wise, Jack," he said, when the girls were out of earshot. "Bodine will never forgive you for taking that horse away from him."

"Partly for that," I did it," Douglas answered. "This masquerade has served a good purpose, but its time is nearly over."

"And then?"

"Then I want to gather together the few ranchers who still have courage, destroy that cursed morada before they realize we've started, and find the hiding place of the Yellow Killer."

"Sounds like a fair-sized mouthful to me. And today you may find you have another enemy at hand by riding that man-slayer. Don't ever underestimate Paul Bodine."

"Oh, it's never wise to underestimate anyone," Douglas answered lightly. And not until later was he to learn how true a word he had spoken.

From that day on Douglas and the big roan stallion were inseparable. Within a week a bond of sympathy based on mutual respect had been sealed between them, until to the amazement of the countryside the stallion followed him like a faithful dog.

GAME PROGRAM TO BE EXTENDED

Farmer and Sportsman to Co-operate; Meeting Planned Tuesday

workable program for conservation throughout the state.

Columbiana is one of 10 counties in District No. 3 of the conservation division. Under the proposed decentralized program, district headquarters would be maintained at Ravenna for convenience and administering of immediate needs of the district through closer contact with local conservation problems.

Protect Land Owner

The conservation department recognizes that the farmers contribution to the rearing of Ohio's wild life is very great and is determined to give the farmer and land owner protection from the abuses of the unthinking hunter. The co-operation of sportsmen, farmers and conservation groups with the division of forestry in the planting of trees and feed bearing shrubs is urged as an erosion preventative and also to furnish food and cover for wildlife. The latest practices in game propagation and the stocking of the districts with wild life will also be outlined.

Plead Not Guilty To Murder Charges

BELLEFONTAINE, Feb. 10.—Don Slater, 18, one of three persons pleading innocent to first degree murder charges in the hammer slaying of Fred Jenkins, 56, will receive a preliminary hearing Tuesday.

Slater requested the hearing after entering his plea late yesterday in Magistrate H. H. Newell's court. He was held without bond in the jail where Jenkins' widow, Minnie, 47, and their 18-year-old son, Merlin, were lodged in default of bond after earlier pleas of innocent.

Neither Mrs. Jenkins nor her son attended burial services for Jenkins in Sidney yesterday.

Prosecutor J. Ewing Smith said Slater confessed killing Jenkins Feb. 1 because the husband abused his family. Slater, who worked in Mrs. Jenkins' lunch room, said the woman aided him in disposing of the body and that Merlin helped remove the bed on which Jenkins was slain while asleep in his Huntsville home, Smith reported.
